

Agoraphobia prompted by panic

QUESTION: What is the relationship between so-called panic attacks and agoraphobia?

ANSWER: Agoraphobia is best described as a complication of panic attacks.

Panic attacks are spontaneous attacks of anxiety that usually manifest themselves with physical symptoms including heart palpitations, dizziness, tremulousness and sweating. These attacks are not precipitated by any specific event, place or problem.

Dr. Johnson

However, as such attacks become recurrent, the individual tends to develop a fear of having attacks in public places and begins to practice what is called "avoidance behavior." As this avoidance behavior intensifies, it progresses to the state of being housebound. It is at this point that the person is often labeled as being agoraphobic.

There are now very effective drugs for treating the panic attacks. Once panic attacks are under control with medication, avoidance behavior can be tackled with desensitization or behavior modification.

Q: Does estrogen, when given for menopausal problems, lead to an increased risk for cancer?

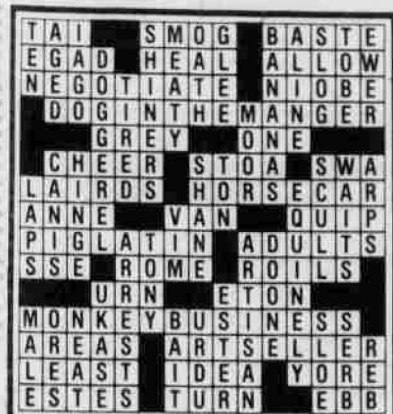

A: There has been great concern among both patients and doctors that the use of estrogen can increase the risk for endometrial cancer. However, many doctors believe that the studies suggesting such a risk are out of date.

Recently, several groups of experts have suggested that estrogen is valuable in post-menopausal women in preventing osteoporosis, and that when given carefully and monitored carefully, its risks are outweighed by the potential benefit.
